and not compromised by inclement weather, it's really the only one you need.

Removing the lower bridge drastically altered the interior of the main deck. From the main saloon entrance, sight lines now stretch all the way to the forward windscreen, where a galley and dining area has replaced the bridge. "Moving the galley has changed things completely," says Chinery of this country kitchen-style arrangement. The standard configuration of the main deck is for an open-plan space with the galley opening on to the dining area, but there are also options to partially or fully enclose the galley for traditional crew service. The galley counters are finished in a hard-wearing Caesarstone. "We moved away from natural marbles because the consistency of quality is better and it doesn't stain," says Chinery. Miele appliances are standard in the galley, though Chinery notes that Americans might want Sub-Zero refrigeration instead.

Further opening up the main saloon is a floating spiral staircase to port, which catches the eye immediately upon entering the room. "It adds an interesting architectural feature to the interior and helps to create a light and airy feel, which is accentuated by natural light that's maximised by the large windows," says Ewen Foster, chief technical officer at Sunseeker International. "The interior has elements inspired by nature, with curved lines, soft shapes and natural materials."

The sinuous staircase on the main deck fits in with other curvaceous interior items, such as a sweeping, curved bulkhead adjacent to the upholstered headboard in the master cabin and the soft curve of the bespoke vanity desk and bedside table. The full-beam owner's cabin is found on the lower deck. Accessed from the main staircase, it is set forward of two guest cabins amidships. The owner's cabin offers a layout choice of a sofa or breakfast seating, and the guest cabins have the option of fixed or sliding twins or fixed double berths. Meanwhile, the forward VIP cabin is reached via a separate stairway off the dining area. "The yacht is well laid out for family cruising, and with the private VIP cabin it works great with another couple," says the owner of the first hull.

Providing multiple options, whether it be layout or decor, is fundamental for an owner to be able to put their stamp on a series boat such as this. The builder has a dedicated interior collection for owners to choose from, which includes a range of fabrics, wall linings, leather, coloured lacquer, stone, veneer, flooring and decorative lighting. "The collection is created in close collaboration with Design Unlimited, and it's characterised by a sophisticated palette of materials," says Foster.
